From the Augusta Constitutionalist. Expenditures of the Government-Opposition

The public expenditures are more under the control of Congress than of the executive departments; and the they so loudly profess, but are guilty of more extravapolicy of any party in reference to them, is, therefore, more clearly exhibited by its action in that body than has been in the history of the Government. by its action in an administration of the Government. The opposition, as our readers are aware, had a majority in the popular branch of the thirty-fourth Congress, sufficient to control its organization and its action; and the record of that Congress, upon the subject of the public expenditures, is the latest, as it is the best practical illustration of the principles in relation to these expenditures by which they are governed. They are just now loud in their professions of economy, and in their denunciations of the extravagance of the Democratic party; but a few facts, furnished by this record of re-echoed to the thunder of the artillery, and were darkthe thirty-fourth Congress, will serve to show that they ened with the dust and smoke of battle. Many of our do not practice, when in power, the economy which they profess; but, on the contrary, are more extravagant than the party whose extravagance they denounce. For these ten years have dimmed the recollection of the previous other Democratic exchanges.

1. The legislative expenses of the opposition House of Representatives of the thirty-fourth Congress, deducting from them the sum of seven hundred and ninetyfour thousand five hundred and eighty dollars and sixty cents for the difference in the pay of members under the old and the new compensation law, were three hundred and eighteen thousand six hundred and fifty dollars and hill about twenty-seven miles west of Milan. It apforty-nine cents more than those of the Democratic House of the preceding Congress. This is proven by the following official statement from the Register of the Treasury, which we commend to the attention of our and at noon of that day received marching orders from readers:

Last War Between Austria and Sardinia.

At the present crisis everything concerning Austria and Sardinia will be perused with peculiar interest, and it may therefore not be out of place to recall the last occasion when the armies of the two powers met upon the battle field, and when the gallant little kingdom of Sardinia was not, as now, aided by the gigantic support of France. Scarce a decade has passed since the plains of Novara readers will vividly remember this great conflict, and the interest it excited; but with the majority the past European crisis, and the battle of Novara is to them but an historical tradition. The following from the New York Evening Post, however, briefly recapitulates the particulars of that eventful conflict: The battle of Novara, nearly as fatal to the ambitious schemes of Sardinia as Pultowa was to Sweden, or Waterloo to Bonaparte, took place on the 24th of March, 1849, near Novara, a city of Piedmont, situated on a pears that on the morning of the 20th the Piedmontese troops, commanded by General Chrzanowski, had concentrated in force about fifty thousand men at Novara,

In the meantime Charles Albert was in the immediate vicinity, about to advance to Pavia and take possession of that place. By stratgeical movements, Radetzky cut off communication between the forces commanded by the general and the king, and then pursued the latter. Finding themselves unable to retreat, the Sardinian troops faced the pursuers, and were, on the 21st, discomfitted at Vercelli and hastily retreated towards Turin. On the 24th the Austrians and Piedmontese again came into collision. Then ensued the battle of Novara. Radetzky, in his official dispatches to his government, gives the following account of the struggle: "The hostile army already [on the 24th of March] cut off from what was, in reality, their line of retreat. determined, with a force of fifty thousand men, again to try the fortune of war in a position near Olengo, close 25,000 00 to Novara. The second division, which forms the vanguard under Gen. Aspre, marched on the 23d towards 125,000 00 Olengo, and there encountered the enemy, whose unexpected force made the battle doubtful for some hours. I had placed the fourth division on the right flank of the 33,544 09 enemy, and behind that the first, in order to take him completely in the rear on the other side of the Agoyna. 11,778 84 The Archduke Albrecht, commanding the vanguard di-11,818 73 vision, kept the enemy at bay until Baron Aspre and Baron Appel, with the third division, brought up their 75,768 61 forces on the two wings of that commanded by the Archduke Albrecht, while I ordered up the fourth division to 203,918 82 support the centre.
